We sought to gather expert opinions regarding the evaluation of children and youth with epidermolysis bullosa (EB) and to determine whether EB was considered a comorbidity among these physicians. A survey was distributed to members of the National Pediatric EB Network, dermatology, and orthopaedic surgery fellowship-training programs. Responses were completed using a Likert scale (1, strongly disagree to 5, strongly agree). Thirty-eight attendees responded to the survey, all of whom were fellowship-trained pediatric orthopaedic surgeons. The majority of respondents (85%) agreed or strongly agreed that orthopaedic surgeons should be familiar with EB. Of the 32 respondents to survey questions specific to EB, there was substantial agreement (ranging from a mean of 82% to a mean of 97%) that EB is a significant comorbidity that cannot be ignored, should be considered when making decisions about treating a child with osteomyelitis, and should be considered as a possible differential diagnosis for pediatric patients with tenderness, pain, and swelling in the spine, hip, or knee. In addition, there was a range of agreement (from a mean of 61% to a mean of 96%) regarding questions regarding the usefulness and effectiveness of the Orphanet Diseases of the Skin codes, the tendency for orthopaedic surgeons to treat patients with EB, and diagnostic

Various types of backup steering column locks have been developed to prevent unintentional opening of a vehicle's steering column during an accident. Examples of these backup steering column locks can be seen in U.S. Pat. No. 4,927,077 to Cline, U.S. Pat. No. 4,948,128 to Cline et al., and U.S. Pat. No. 5,385,182 to Mackey, III et al. In each of the above mentioned patents, a backup steering column lock includes a first subassembly having a first rod and a first plate, and a second subassembly having a second rod and a second plate. The first rod is slidably disposed in a first bore formed in a first wall of the vehicle's steering column, and the second rod is slidably disposed in a second bore formed in a second wall of the steering column. The first plate is slidably disposed in a third bore formed in the vehicle's steering column, and the second plate is slidably disposed in a fourth bore formed in the second wall of the steering column. The backup steering column lock disclosed in the above mentioned Cline patent includes first and second slides which are received in the first and second bores, respectively, in a camming relationship with the first and second rods, respectively, such that the first and second rods are urged toward the first and second walls, respectively, of the steering column. The backup steering
